

Medical Support

What is a medical support order?

Medical support exists when the court orders one or both parents to provide medical insurance for a child. The medical insurance required is health not dental and vision.

Child Support Services will periodically send a letter requesting proof of medical insurance to the parent required to provide it.

What if the parent required to provide medical insurance won't do it?

- If that parent is employed and health insurance is available at group rates, your worker will send a notice to that parent's employer requiring them to enroll the child or children in the medical plan.
- If that parent is not employed or does not carry private insurance, your worker can file a contempt motion with the court. If that parent still refuses, the penalty could include jail time.

What if the parent required to provide medical insurance can't afford it?

The parent ordered to provide medical support should request a change in their child support order called an "order modification."

To request an order modification, complete a Request for Administrative Review of the Support Order (ODJFS 01849). You can contact your worker for assistance.

If you don't know your worker's name and address call 946-7387.

If you are required to provide medical insurance for your children and you change employers:

- First, enroll your child in your new employer's medical plan.
- Second, call your worker and provide the name of your new employer and insurance company. If you leave a message for your caseworker be sure to leave your full name and your social security number.

My child support order says that medical expenses not covered by insurance should be split between both parents. Can child support make the other parent pay their share?

No. Splitting medical expenses is not a medical support order and it is not possible for Child Support Services to enforce paying these types of expenses.
